

Composters hooked up to an air blower which is controlled by a timer.

Gases from the composters during aeration are forced through a biofilter and then activated carbon (on far left). No odour can be detected.

Air enters the bottom of the compostor via a perforated loop embedded in woodchips. Temperature probes are located in the solid matrix.

End compost product once it has matured.