‘Research, Policy & Practice’

The mechanisms for research transfer are complex. In a policy and planning environment, research findings and translation is one consideration among many factors involved in policy and planning decision making. The political environment has certain considerations too - quoting Adam Graycar, Head, Cabinet Office, Premier and Cabinet, "political decisions are made on the basis of political factors - research is a contributor not a driver" in planning and practice settings, using research findings require different considerations.

The presentation and panel discussion will explore some of the complexities in the researcher, government policy and program settings.
